

Rambling

By: Quentin Burgess

Rambling, what a beautiful way to speak. Rambling is an extremely versatile part of our glorious form of communication and has many uses to show off such versatility. These uses range from getting a simple chuckle out of someone, to stalling for time and improvising as you wait for your co-star to remember their line as you film the next Oscar award winning movie. Speaking of Oscar award winning movies, have you seen “The Dark Knight”, starring English actor Christian Charles and Philip Bale as Batman/Bruce Wayne, and Heath Andrew Ledger as Joker? If you want my two cents about it, its easily one of my favorite movies of all time, right behind Matt Reeves’ “The Batman” (2022). Speaking of, Matt Reeves’ “The Batman” (2022) was an absolutely astounding film. The cinematography perfectly captured the dark and run-down atmosphere of a crazed Gotham, the performance of Robert Pattinson as Batman portraying him as the nightcrawling vigilante filled with the need to find the next clue is one in a million. Not to mention the fantastic car scene! Although that’s besides the point. The point I’m trying to make is that rambling is one of the many beautiful ways to communicate. If you want proof, I just rambled for the better part of an entire introduction paragraph, yet you stuck around to read the rest.

As you can see, rambling is amazing, rambling is beautiful, rambling...is art. Take a moment to study this art piece, see how the artist wandered around the canvas with the paint? Notice how the colors seem to have little to no correlation with each other, yet are so connected, or how there seems to be no set pallet or even reason for the piece. One might argue that this piece of art itself is rambling. Speaking of art, the BLINK festival of light and art is coming up from October 13th to October 16th. This festival stretches 30 blocks around Cincinnati and shows many talented artist’s pieces using light as their paint and Cincinnati as their canvas. The picture to the right shows one of the many demonstrations of the mystical art created for the BLINK festival. Speaking of blink, you are now manually blinking. Blinking is used to rehydrate your eyeballs, and why else would you need to rehydrate your eyeballs other than if salt got in them. Speaking of salt, did you know that the first known salt shaker debuted in 1858? Its crazy to think that people lived for more than 1858 years without a proper way to shake their salt onto their foods. Speaking of foods, did you know that sweet potatoes are projected to be in abundance this season? According to theproducenews.com, "Farm Fresh Produce looks to a promising sweet potato season". But that's not important right now! Whats important is how beautiful Rambling can be, I would go as far as to call it an artform. I did just explain the upcoming art festival, the history of the salt shaker, and the projected plentiful harvest of sweet potatoes! So many topics covered and stories told with just a few sentences.

In short, Rambling is art. The ability to have so many different things communicated to others with nothing but a few sentences with rough connections is amazing to say the least. If rambling is possible with words, what can humanity do with this in the future?
